So much about Spago should make you hate it: it feels like a hotel restaurant, is insanely expensive, and has a crowd that's a mix of visiting businessmen, important Hollywood people, and people who've lived in Beverly Hills since the '50s. And yet, even now, going to Spago is still one of the ultimate LA eating experiences. The menu has Italian and Asian influences, but the two dishes you're really here for are the smoked salmon pizza and the spicy tuna cones. The service also makes you feel like the king of the world. You might just have to be in order to pick up the check.

What is it? Wolfgang Puck's flagship is known for its power lunches and celeb sightings, but the fine dining institution's still serving haute bites that can outshine the star power that frequents it.

Why we love it: After nearly 40 years, Spago is both the old standby and the new kid on the block thanks to an ever-changing menu that makes the restaurant seem altogether fresh. Don't worry, you can still order the smoked salmon pizza, and Spago purists will be pleased to hear the kitchen is refreshingly old-school when it comes to presentation, but modern flourishes are what keep this icon feeling fresh without ditching its hits.

Time Out tip: If it's your first visit you must order Spago's iconic tasting menu for the classics, but if you're a repeat guest, the most fun you can have is off-roading with the fleeting and hyper-seasonal specials, especially when it comes to dessert.
